Principal's Message

Teaching and learning in Engineering subjects are very challenging tasks because our end result is expected to be a high degree of learning and self-actualization for the graduates.

Then only Engineers can be really capable, productive and inventive. Nowadays, people rush to seek admission in very narrow specializations, neglecting all better options to build a rich career. It's like entering into gambling. Sometimes some may land up with distinct roles giving them the job satisfaction for longer times. Many may not become prudent enough to be well placed and many may fail to get adapted to the technological developments. Engineers are to be problem solvers. So, the discipline has to be broad based and directly linked to the common man's world of work. Nowadays, infrastructure includes buildings, roads, power networks, communication systems, hospitals and so on. Information technology is the modern means for communication, entertainment, industrial designs, automation and many such areas of real world applications. When we connect this technology to the vast areas of applications we get new dimensions for each discipline in engineering and technology. We need a combination of domain knowledge and the IT skills to flourish. The learning has to begin in the early days of undergraduate studies in the core areas of applied science and technology. A broad-based engineering degree and a deeper knowledge on real world solutions will assure life-long means for a good living. Let us try to create a world that guarantees a stable career and satisfaction.
